The USAID Positive Pathways activity supports Jamaican target communities, parents, and families to prevent youth violence through activities such as school safety programs, parenting interventions, conflict resolution sessions, life skills training, psychosocial support, literacy training, technical and vocational training, business and entrepreneurship training, career counseling, and job placement assistance.

Positive Pathways pays particular attention to gendered dimensions of violence, particularly gender-based violence, in the targeted communities. It also helps adolescent mothers develop parenting skills and resist domestic violence, as well as employ practices that decrease their children's exposure to violence.
